Method and System for Logging Dynamically Inserted Information for Web Usage Analysis

*Idea of disclosure

Problem Solved or Discovery Made by this invention
In a Web server environment, Web pages are composed dynamically during run-time. Information such as advertisements, summaries of articles, headlines, and links are routinely inserted into Web pages by a CGI or servlets. The pieces of information may be stored in database or on file system.

The current Web servers have no capability to log information about dynamic contents, only request records logged. There is a need to collect information about which pieces of information were viewed by each user. This information enables effective monitoring of the efficacy of information delivery and content personalization, allowing an administrator to change their placement, change their rates, etc. as appropriate based on the Usage Analysis.

Solution (a description of "the invention", including figures inline as appropriate)
All dynamically insertable pieces of information are tagged with an unique identifier. This process may be accomplished by the MD5 algorithm. The information and its associated identifier are stored together.

When a piece of information (advertisements, articles, headlines, etc.) is selected to be included in the response page, its associated identifier is deposited into the provided Response Buffer. The Logging Facility collects the Response Buffer at the time the Web page is sent to the client and records the identifiers together with the request record into the log file.
